

“Pulling back from Europe would save this country millions of dollars annually. The cost of stationing NATO troops in Europe is enormous. In addition, clearly these funds can be put to better use.”

Trump suggests supporting Russia, but with strings attached: “We need to tell Russia and other recipients that if they want our dime they had better do our dance, at least in matters regarding our national security. These people need us much more than we need them. We have advantage, and we are crazy not to use it to better advantage.”

Donald Trump’s stance on ISIS is that if Russia wants to wage war against it they should do it. Trump believes that if they continue expand their operation in the Middle East it will harm the country in the long term.

To sum it up, Clinton’s international policy will focus on expansion of the USA influence over other countries. Trump’s approach is different in a sense that it is more focused on internal problems. Trump’s position will allow more freedom to such countries as Russia.

Trump is certainly not stereotypical in his approach to international relations. Also, he is very experienced in handling different international business partnerships and that is why he approaches the modern world with a view of realistic technocrat. Donald Trump believes that it is immensely important to improve ties with Russia and have a dialogue with the Russian government.

So at the end of the day Trump is Russia’s best bet...

Of course we cannot be sure who is going to win the election. The views would actually persist if Trump wins the White House.

However, no matter what the outcome will be we should always stay optimistic about political future and take the persistently changing nature of modern world into consideration in order to embrace the future with open arms.
